The Good Old Days: Family Caring for Family

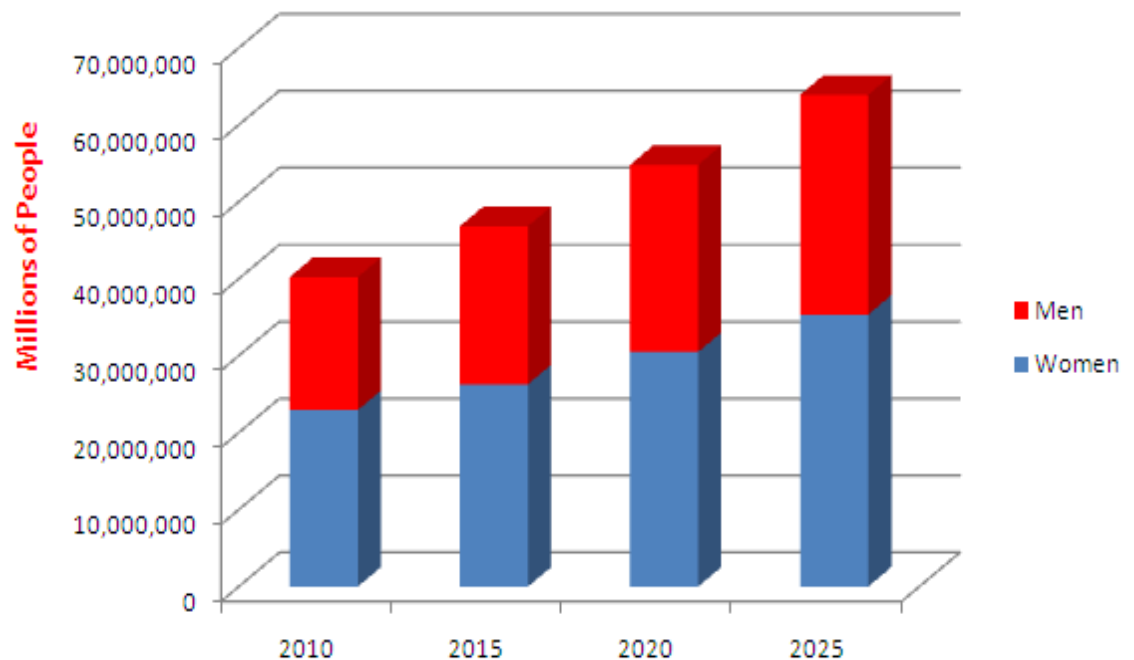

Devotion to family and respect for tradition, including the deeply held belief that family members support and care for each other as the years go by, have long been defining characteristics of those who call our community home.

Today's Challenge: Caring for America's Soaring Senior Population

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the number of Americans age 65 and older will grow by nearly 24 million over the next 15 years

Today's Challenge: Caring for America's Soaring Senior Population

Challenge One: The rapid growth in the elderly population is occurring at a time when people between the ages of 18 and 50 are leaving their hometowns for college, to find jobs, or to pursue economic opportunities in other parts of the country.

Challenge Two:

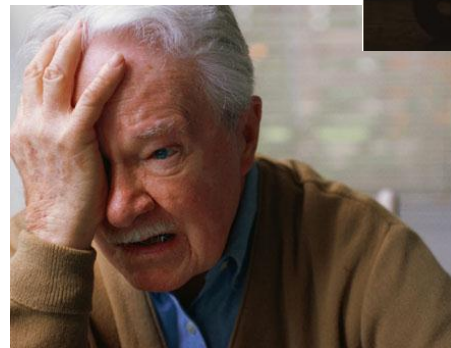

Members of the “Sandwich Generation,” people born between 1946 and 1964 are being squeezed between the need to care for growing children and their aging parents.

Challenge Three:

Deciding what to do: live with the worry and fear of leaving a parent alone at home, dealing with the guilt of placing them in an institutional setting like a nursing home, or finding a way to pay for expensive assisted living facilities.

Challenge Four: The collapse of the real estate market makes the already difficult decision to move a loved one out of their home harder than ever before.
